The Humanist Code Of Ethics

How many of us have found some topic relating to Humanism coming up in a conversation with a friend or stranger who doesn't know much about us? It may not happen very often, but what would we say if it did? About various nontheistic groups (e.g., atheists, agnostics, free-thinkers—there's actually a fairly long list) sooner or later certain standard questions are likely to arise—for example, how is it possible to be “good” without believing in a god, or how can one be “happy” without believing in a life after death (this list is also pretty long—maybe even endless). Some nontheistic groups do not have any position on this kind of question, while others do. Most Humanists have a position on many esthetic, ethical, political, economic, or other issues—but how many of the answers do we agree on? And should we agree?

Not long ago David Schafer heard Paul Gobell speak at the New Britain Unitarian Universalist Fellowship on “The Humanist Code of Ethics.” Listening to Paul's lecture, and the discussion that followed it, gave David a curious sense of déjà vu. During the early years of the Humanist Association of Connecticut, we regularly invited our own members to speak about their Humanist beliefs and how they became Humanists. This kind of program was very popular among us, as it not only helped us get to know each other a lot better but also required us to stop and think a little more about our own Humanism and its multiple dimensions. The similarity to Paul's lecture suggested that our members would enjoy hearing Paul for themselves—hence this program.

the physically and emotionally disabled. His artwork has been shown in museums and fine art galleries. Paul says he is naturally a doubting Thomas, and being raised in an overly strict fundamentalist Christian household deepened his tendency to question everything. “Becoming an Atheist and a Humanist was certainly the natural outcome.”

Here's a brief abstract of Paul's talk: “Humanism is a rational system based on the recognition that moral values are naturally wired in each of us and further formed through experience. The philosophies that comprise humanism rely upon ethics that defend reason and freedom, while rejecting dogma and the supernatural views of reality. When people reject unreasoned beliefs and endorse humanist ethics, they can see the commonality of the human condition and can begin to achieve solutions to social and cultural problems.” In this lecture Paul will look at two conflicting foundations of ethics.

Please join us on Monday, January 19, 2009, at 700 Hartford Turnpike at 7:30 p.m. for refreshments and this fascinating talk at 8:00 p.m. Bring a friend!
